Scripture Reading: Mark 11:1-11

We are told to let our light shine, and if it does, we won't need to tell anybody it does. Lighthouses don't fire cannons to call attention to their shining — they just shine. —Dwight L. Moody

The donkey is a humble beast, right?
Wrong.

In the Hebrew Scriptures, it is kings who ride on donkeys.

That may sound strange — especially in light of countless Palm Sunday sermons we've heard. Yet, if we compared a few Palm Sunday terms in the media, we might be surprised.

For example, if we compare references to “king” vs. “servant” — “king” wins every time. Or, try “war” vs. “peace” — there's more buzz about war than peace on both the Internet in general and in news stories.

And, more to our point, “horse” has it all over “donkey.”

Yet, in 1 Kings 1:32-34, an elderly King David summons the religious leaders, commanding them to make arrangements for Solomon's coronation. He instructs them to “have my son Solomon ride on my own mule.”

A royal mule? What's that all about?

David was a hill-country chieftain, and Solomon a hill-country chieftain's son. Although, years before, this scrappy warrior had become king of all Israel, he never forgot where he came from.

King David's royal mount was not a horse. A horse is for those who dwell on the plains, who traverse highways broad and straight. A king like David, who got his start leading bands of raiders from cave to cave along rocky trails, preferred a sure-footed mule.

This is why, in later times, those who foretold the coming of a new king, a Messiah, to assume the throne of David, always had that monarch riding into Jerusalem on a donkey.

The Roman overlords might have been amused by this somewhat comical sight — but Jewish zealots who knew their history would not have missed the symbolism.

Prayer: Lord Jesus, thank you for presenting yourself not as a warlord, but as the Prince of Peace. May I also remember that it is more important to serve than to be served. Amen.

SAME ... BUT DIFFERENT

According to some definitions, a homophone is a word with the same pronunciation as, but different meaning than, another word. Thus, homophones come in pairs (at least). However, some remarkable homophones come in triples. Identify the first homophone using the clue provided. Then write two more homophones. We have done No. 1 for you.
